The Iranian regime, like many others has succeeded in completely repressing Iranian women. At many government institutions, universities and airports, there (i) separate entrances for women, where they are often checked (ii) signs of violating the strict dress code.

They are (i) to go out unless they are covered by clothing that (i) everything but their hands and faces. At one of the universities where I used to teach, I'm told a female professor was expelled (i) her wrist had shown from under her (i) while she was writing (i) the blackboard.

Yet these measures, meant to render women invisible and powerless are paradoxically (i) women visible and powerful. By attempting to control every aspect of women's lives and by staking its legitimacy on the Iranian people's supposed desire for this control the regime unwittingly handed women a powerful weapon: every private act or gesture in of official rules is now a strong political statement.
